

TrophyTime

By Praneet Mekala, Andrea Mechery, and Hava Kantrowitz

Problem

For athletes participating in multiple competitions and events, registering and maintaining these events can become hectic and disorderly. Moreover, there currently is no centralized system for users to find multiple competitions and register for them on one platform.

Major Competitors

Dance Comp Genie is a $750.00 paid app that allows users to sign up for dance competitions, view dance schedules, and allows judges to record scores during dance competitions.

AskFred is a website with a cluttered user interface that allows users to sign up for fencing competitions and view fencing schedules.

MyTennisGroup is a paid website and app that allows users to create tennis groups, sign up for tennis matches and competitions, and create and view tennis practice schedules.

Trophy Time is an evolutionary app.

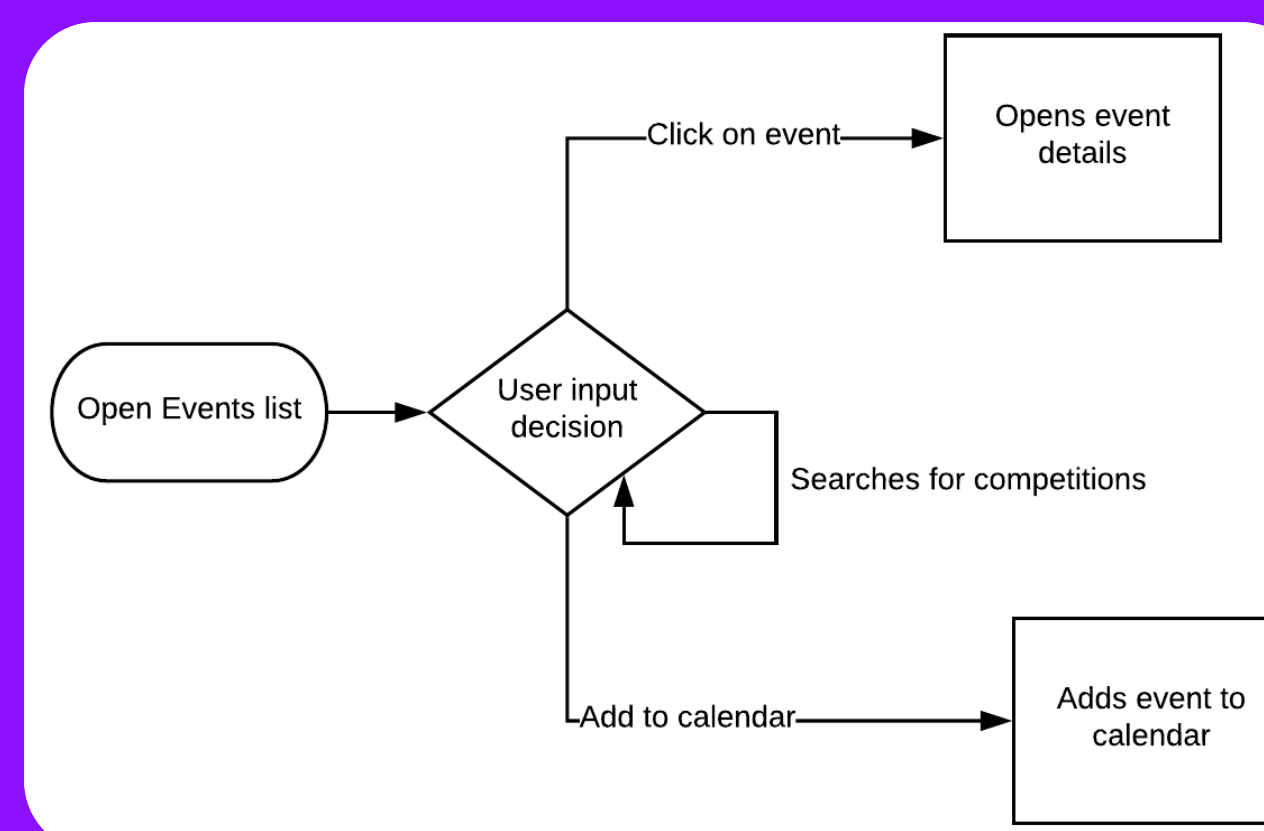

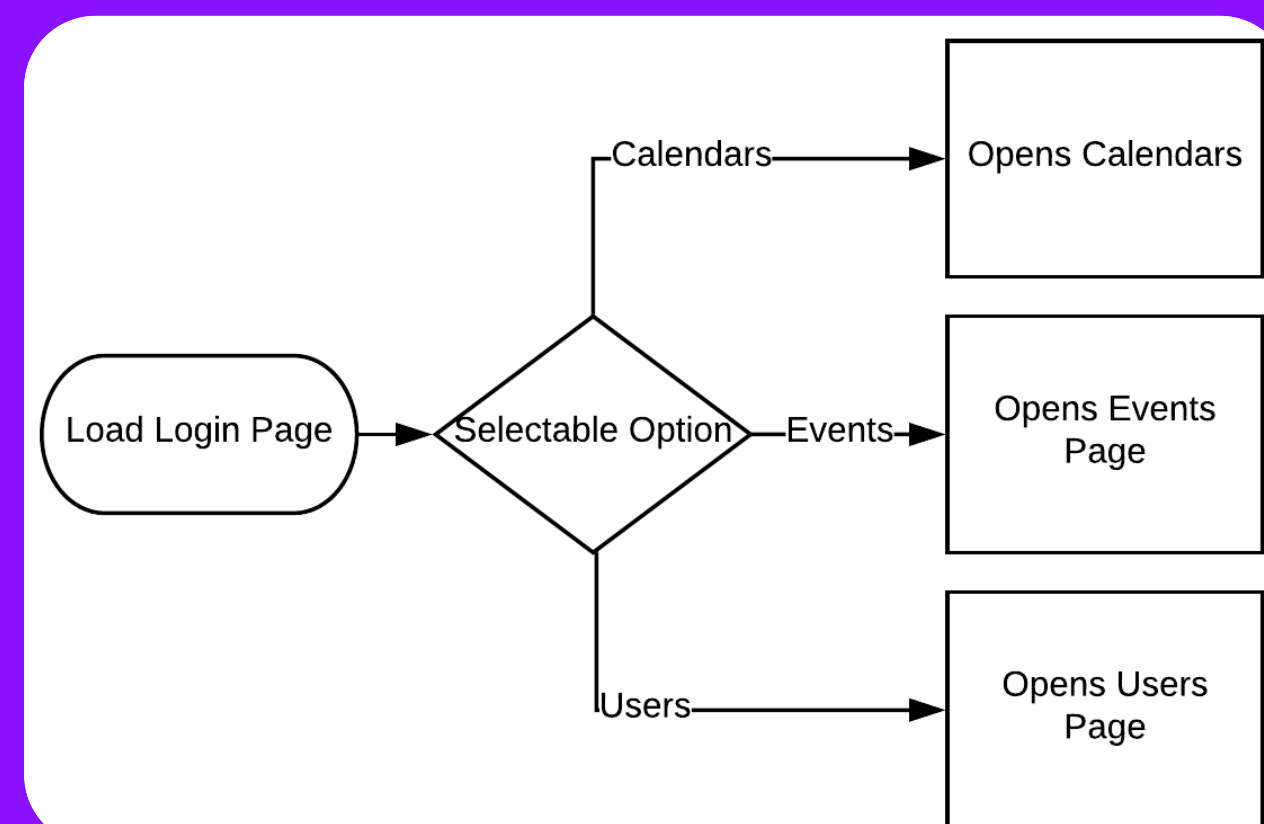

Minimum Viable Product

The app allows users to search for competitions that are stored in an online database.

Users are provided with the name, date, time and location of each event.

Users are provided with a link to be redirected to the event website, which they can click to register for the event.

Users can place events into their Google Calendar.

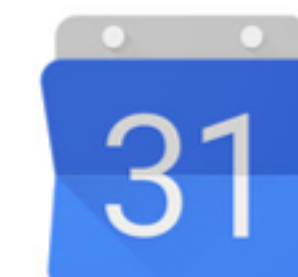

Third Party Tools

Firebase

Google Sign-In

App Services

Touchscreen

Calendar and Sign in via Google

Target Audience

Athletes who are looking for a place to keep track of their tournament schedules and event organizers looking to advertise their events on a common platform.

Extra Features

Event information is stored in Firebase, an online database.

Event planners can register as an admin, which grants them the ability to add or remove competitions from the database.

Future Extensions

Parse websites like Active.com to find competition information and automatically enter/delete events in the database.

Include features for users to be suggested events based on their location and event preferences.

Handle events beyond sports, such as math meets or debate team competitions.

Register for events within the app.
